RATIONALE

SIU-EAU Winter School 2026

The SIU–EAU Winter School 2026 is specifically conceived to support young urologists at a decisive stage of their professional development, when solid scientific knowledge must be complemented by transferable skills that are rarely taught formally but are essential for long-term success.

Beyond updating participants on key aspects of urological science, the course aims to help early-career urologists learn how to think, communicate, and position themselves within clinical teams, academic environments, and international professional networks. Using practical examples drawn from real-world urological scenarios, the program addresses the everyday challenges faced by young clinicians as they transition from trainees to independent professionals.

A core objective of the SIU-EAU Winter School is to empower participants to:

- approach scientific guidelines with a critical yet constructive mindset
- communicate ideas and results clearly to peers, senior colleagues, patients, and the public
- develop confidence in voicing opinions and managing professional interactions
- begin building a personal leadership style rooted in self-awareness and responsibility

Learning by doing as a bridge from training to practice

The gap between theoretical knowledge and real-life professional demands can be substantial. The “learning by doing” sessions are designed precisely to bridge this gap, allowing participants to practice skills that are immediately applicable in clinical, academic, and team-based settings.

During these sessions, participants are divided into three small working groups, reflecting the collaborative environment typical of urology departments and research units. Each group works on focused tasks such as critiquing guideline statements, designing communication strategies, or managing complex leadership and patient-communication scenarios.

These group activities are intentionally structured to help young urologists:

1) Gain confidence in active participation

Many early-career clinicians hesitate to speak up or challenge established views. By working in small groups and presenting concise outputs, participants are encouraged to articulate their reasoning, defend their ideas, and contribute meaningfully to group discussions.

2) Develop structured critical thinking

Analyzing gaps in guidelines or communication pathways helps participants move from passive guideline users to reflective professionals who understand how evidence is generated, interpreted, and applied—and where its limitations lie.

3) Practice clear and effective communication

Preparing short presentations and responding to faculty challenges mirrors real situations such as case discussions, research meetings, or conference presentations. Participants learn how to convey complex messages clearly, manage time constraints, and respond constructively to feedback.

4) Strengthen self-leadership and teamwork skills

Interacting with peers and faculty challengers prompts reflection on personal communication style, emotional responses, and leadership tendencies. These moments foster self-awareness, resilience, and the ability to adapt—key elements of self-leadership in demanding clinical environments.

Building essential soft skills early in the career

Throughout the SIU-EAU Winter School, soft skills are not treated as abstract concepts but as practical competencies embedded in everyday urological practice. Communication sessions focus on explaining science to different audiences, handling sensitive conversations, and managing public or media exposure. Leadership sessions help participants understand their role within teams, explore management styles, and appreciate the value of mentoring and service-oriented leadership.

The course encourages participants to reflect on how they want to work, collaborate, and grow, laying the foundation for a sustainable and fulfilling career.

Expected outcomes for participants

By the end of the SIU-EAU Winter School, young urologists are expected to have gained:

- greater confidence in engaging in scientific and clinical discussions
- practical tools for effective communication within teams and with patients
- increased awareness of their own strengths and areas for development
- an initial but solid framework for leadership and professional identity building

Ultimately, the SIU-EAU Winter School seeks to accompany young urologists at a pivotal moment in their careers, helping them evolve from competent trainees into reflective, communicative, and responsible professionals ready to actively contribute to the future of urology.
